Dogs

Dogs have lived with humans for many thousands of years – working, hunting, guarding and being our friends. Descended from the same common ancestor as the grey wolf, many different types have evolved over the centuries – from the very smallest to the largest, from the bravest to the fastest. But regardless of type, dogs have always remained loving and loyal.

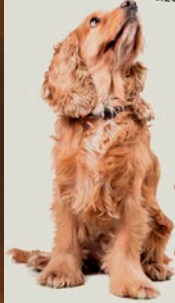

More people around the world own a dog than any other type of pet. Dogs have accompanied us for tens of millennia and over this vast expanse of time they have become an essential part of daily life for many people: helping to hunt for food, protecting livestock, pulling sleds and providing companionship. Different types gradually evolved as dogs demonstrated characteristics suited to their environment and roles, and people developed these types into useful working breeds, such as the sleek, fast sighthounds or the strong, tough Spitz-types.

As people recognised the working abilities of their dogs, they began to breed them specifically to retain these characteristics and, as a result, hundreds of breeds were slowly developed.

The first dog shows were held in the 19th century, which led, in 1873, to the founding of the Kennel Club to govern contents and champion purebred dogs. The Kennel Club now holds the registration for pedigree dogs in the UK, and standards, with breeds as categories based on their Hound, Pastoral, Terrier, Toy, Utility and Working With welfare and best breeding practices in mind the Kennel Club established the Assured Breeding Scheme, the only such scheme in the UK. All breeders in this scheme have been inspected and carry out vital breed-specific health testing and screening, to ensure that puppies are the healthiest they can be.
